Deleuze talks about this effect of sensation as the "transcendent exercise" of the faculty of sensibility; here we could refer to the third chapter of Difference and Repetition, where Deleuze lays out a non-Kantian "differential theory of the faculties." In this remarkable theory, intensity is "difference in itself," that which carries the faculties to their limits.

Gilles Deleuze (Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy)

In the 1960s Deleuze began to philosophize in a more original vein, producing two major works, Difference and Repetition (1968) and The Logic of Sense (1969). In the former he argued against the devaluation of "difference" in Western metaphysics and tried to show that difference inheres in repetition itself.
